

Trump’s White House struggles to get out from under Russia controversy

The president’s aides have expressed frustration at their inability to gain control of Washington’s narrative as the Trump administration — dogged by questions about its conduct in the Russia probe — entered its 11th week in office still in crisis mode.

The Take Analysis

Russia investigation has a new front: Inside the White House

It’s a self-inflicted wound created by President Trump’s baseless claims of wiretapping. Attempts to prove that allegation have snared others. The questions now include what did administration officials do and why did they do it?

Trump ran as a champion of the working class, but his White House is packed with rich aides

Twenty-seven officials had assets worth at least $2.3 billion when they joined the administration, according to a Post analysis of their filings. The new disclosures — filed by about 180 members of the administration — show how Trump has tapped members of the financial elite to serve as his closest aides. The president is not required to release more details of his finances until next year.

Joe Manchin’s high-wire act: Working with Trump — and criticizing both parties

The Democratic senator from West Virginia, who says Republicans are tools for the wealthy, is trying to work with the president. But Manchin remains wedded to an increasingly environmentalist party despite his conservative state’s allegiance to coal.
