First 100 Days

Trump has galvanized activists on the left. Can they stay energized?

Resistance efforts that grabbed headlines in the form of massive women-led marches across the United States the day after the inauguration have settled into something less visible but perhaps much broader.

The Fix Analysis

The winners and losers since Inauguration Day

Although the president has had a steep learning curve, one clear victory was the confirmation of Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

The Fix Analysis

Trump is now pointing toward consolidating his own power

In a Fox News interview, the president called congressional rules "archaic" and said the filibuster is bad for the nation.

Perspective

On the economy, the president talks (and tweets) a great game. But the substance is largely lacking.

Other than reversing some of President Barack Obama's executive orders that Trump claims were bad for the economy and job creation, he hasn't really done very much on the employment and economic fronts.

People's Climate March

Today's march unites people protesting rollbacks of environmental protections

EPA scrubs climate science site from public view

An announcement Friday said the website would be "undergoing changes" to better represent the agency's new direction. One of the sites that appeared to be gone had been used to challenge statements made by the agency's new administrator, Scott Pruitt.
