Shutdown likely averted as GOP backs off health-care push

Despite pressure from the White House, Republicans determined late last night that they didn't have the votes to pass a health-care revision and would not seek to put the proposal on the floor. Now, lawmakers are likely to approve the short-term spending bill when it comes to the floor and keep the government open past midnight on Friday.

Trump governs as he campaigned: Impulsive, unpredictable and loud

ANALYSIS The presidency is an office that historically demands prudence and patience, two attributes not often used to describe the 45th president. Extravagant campaign vows have run up against predictable obstacles. The president and his advisers have been on a steep learning curve, and it has shown.

Perspective

The media are still embarrassing themselves. Just not as much.

For every great scoop, there's been an embarrassing moment of declaring the president statesmanlike for giving a speech without a history-making gaffe.

The Obamas face the paid-speaking circuit — and all the questions that come with it

The former president and first lady, who both made their first appearances as speakers-for-hire on Thursday, could quickly earn millions, following a well-worn path from the White House — but one that poses risks to a personal and political brand rooted in their middle-class backgrounds.
